About the Program:

This Forum will explore the complex realities and psychological challenges to optimal mental health that confront mothers of black children and their families in the continued reality of racial hostility and state-sponsored violence expressed in police brutality. These are transgenerational realities with historical and contemporary components that Black families have always faced. Dr. Green will hold a conversation with some mothers of black children who will talk about their personal experiences attempting to protect their children in ways that they are powerless to control. She will also discuss with them situations they confront in preparing their children to anticipate and negotiate varying forms and locations of racial hostility that they must also navigate for themselves, and that they are powerless to control.

This program qualifies for 3.0 continuing education credits. Attendees must attend entire session to gain credit.

The speaker has no conflicts of interest to report.

Participants will be able to:

1. Identify many of the overt and hidden stressors that mothers of Black children routinely experience.
2. List the ways that racial hostility and need for racial socialization affects and can complicate the dynamics in the parent-child relationship.
3. Describe how this process may pose particular challenges to parenting at different developmental junctures over the lifespan.

4. Describe emotional sequelae for mothers of Black children, as they attempt to navigate this process.
